

CFACC24

Communicate information to customers in different but familiar contexts through a contact centre

Overview

What this standard is about

Effective communication is an essential part of contact centre operations. Many communications are relatively standard and are covered by organisational guidelines. Communication with customers can be carried either verbally and/or in writing and each of these methods demands different skills. Communication can be in different contexts according to who initiated the contact and the groups of services and/or products you are dealing with.

CFACC24

Communicate information to customers in different but familiar contexts through a contact centre

Performance criteria

You must be able to:

Talk to customers on familiar subjects in familiar contact centre situations

- P1 Follow organisational guidelines for greeting and establishing a rapport with a customer
- P2 Describe services and/or products to a customer following organisational guidelines
- P3 Respond to customer questions about services and/or products
- P4 Use your voice to vary the tone of your comments to customers and maintain interest in the services and/or products
- P5 Display active listening by acknowledging customer comments in your responses and/or

Communicate with customers in writing

- P6 Identify when a customer contact situation would benefit from written communication
- P7 Compose written communications to customers following organisational guidelines
- P8 Use recommended formats and layouts for written communication with customers
- P9 Structure written communications to customers so that your meaning is clear and concise
- P10 Review and proofread communications to customers before sending

CFACC24

Communicate information to customers in different but familiar contexts through a contact centre

Knowledge and understanding

You need to know and understand:

- K1 The services and/or products offered or supported by your contact centre
- K2 Organisational requirements and external regulations about what can and cannot be expressed to customers verbally and/or in writing
- K3 Information that is best given to customers verbally and/or information that is best given to customers in writing
- K4 Organisational styles and templates for written communication
- K5 The differences between positive and negative language
- K6 Active listening and how to display it
- K7 Organisational procedures and guidelines for communicating with customers
- K8 Frequently asked customer questions about services and/or products
- K9 The importance of varying voice tone when talking to customers about services and/or products from a contact centre
- K10 The benefits and drawbacks of communicating with customers by telephone and/or in writing
- K11 And/or the importance of review and proofreading when sending written communications to customers

CFACC24

Communicate information to customers in different but familiar contexts through a contact centre

Developed by CfA Business Skills @ Work

Version number 1.0

Date approved May 2011

Indicative review date May 2014

Validity Current

Status Original

Originating organisation CfA Business Skills @ Work

Original URN N/A

Relevant occupations Operator, centre, contact, Adviser, Agent

Suite Contact Centre 2011

Key words Contact Centre, customer service, customer contact, oral communication, written communication